4. During the past three years, men on the HG-11 made sketches and took measurements of Polish coastal waters under the direction of Commander Ivanov. Special maps were drawn up, stamped "very secret", and sent to the Navy Staff; copies of these maps were kept in the HG-11 in a special safe.
5. There is no cooperation between the Polish and Soviet navies. Ships of the two navies do not salute each other at sea or in port.
6. The HG-11 took part in artillery practices; it towed targets which were used by coastal artillery officer candidates from the artillery school at Torun. General Michalko is commandant of this school.
7. There is a strong feeling of hostility between the various elements of the Polish Navy, and no amount of force by politruks can bridge the feeling between these groups. Most officers are Communists for opportunistic reasons, but not more than 10 or 15 percent of naval personnel are active, loyal Communists. Of a crew of 33 men on the HG-11, there were four Communists, seven members of the Z.M.P. (Communist youth organization), and 22 men who were neither. There was a minimum of contact between Communist and non-Communist crewmen on the ship, and most enlisted men thoroughly disliked the younger officers, charging that they obtained their positions for political reasons rather than because they were well-trained, capable officers. There is little social contact between Soviet and Polish officers. The ordinary Polish soldier or sailor strongly dislikes the Communist government, the Soviet Union and the Communist Party. The younger Polish officers, however, seem to be very loyal to the Government.

8. Attendance of members at church services on Sundays is almost impossible in the Polish Navy, as enlisted men are on duty until noon. Attendance at religious services is strongly discouraged by naval politruks, who warn that persons who go to church are enemies of popular democracies and work in the services of American imperialists. When officers attend church they usually wear civilian clothing in order to conceal their status.
